Good design never goes out of style

The inspiration for the new TRUBBNATE lamp was a lamp created by Danish designer Erik Østerby that first appeared in IKEA stores in the 1970s. After Erik's passing, a member of his family found an example that had been made almost 40 years ago. It was in mint condition and even in its original flatpack.

So, they sent it off to IKEA.

When the IKEA Product Team received it they immediately realised it had timeless qualities. Product Developer, Chaira Ripalti, describes her first impression: "I absolutely loved it! From a design perspective, it was simple but strong."

Inspired, they set about creating a lamp that captured the look and feel of the 1970s but used 21st century methods and materials.

The result was TRUBBNATE.

TRUBBNATE Pendant lampshade

The 1970s gets a 2020 makeover

A re-issue of an IKEA design classic, TRUBBNATE casts a soft, diffused light in your home. While its looks may be pure 1970s, its climate footprint is definitely not. This time around it's made partly from recycled plastic.

Water knows no boundaries

Born into a family of hand-weavers, designer K.C Maura weaved his first rug at the age of 22, and ever since he has been exploring weaving techniques for both knotted and Punja flat-woven rugs. His design for TVINGSTRUP conveys a clear message: that water should be shared equally among the people of the earth.

"In this world everyone has created boundaries: between countries, between cities, between families and between beliefs. But there is one thing that cannot be confined or withheld – pure, unbiased water. No wall can stop it, no hand can hold it - no matter the boundary, it will always find its way through. It is meant to be shared."

Putting people first

Indian enterprise Rangсутra engages a community of more than two thousand skilled craftspeople, providing work for rural artisans with few opportunities to earn a living – a group heavily dominated by women. In addition to strengthening local economies, their work contributes to keeping traditions and skills alive. And, as with all IKEA suppliers, the organisation must ensure safe and healthy working conditions by providing a good work environment, regular working hours and proper wages.

In 2020, the health and well-being of workers came sharply in to focus. The emergence of COVID-19 presented a dual threat to Rangсутra artisans; to continue working as usual would jeopardise their health, while the threat of a lockdown would jeopardise their incomes.

As the region went into lockdown, the company adapted and allowed many people to work from home – a solution that not only protected co-workers' health but also allowed them to continue earning money despite the turbulent times. To support Rangсутra IKEA took early decisions to keep the orders, which safeguarded the artisans' jobs.
