

You are previewing this press release. It isn't public yet and won't show in your pressroom. You can however share this secret url with others.

Urban Putt breathes new life into historic downtown Denver with streetcar move and original arch design

Streetcar #54 gets a prominent new location in a tricky move to the other side of Urban Putt Denver's new space

It took a specialized team two days to carefully move the old wooden streetcar inch-by-inch around columns, from one side of the space to the other.

Crews prep streetcar #54 for its move across the new Urban Putt Denver space where it will be used for private parties and dining space.

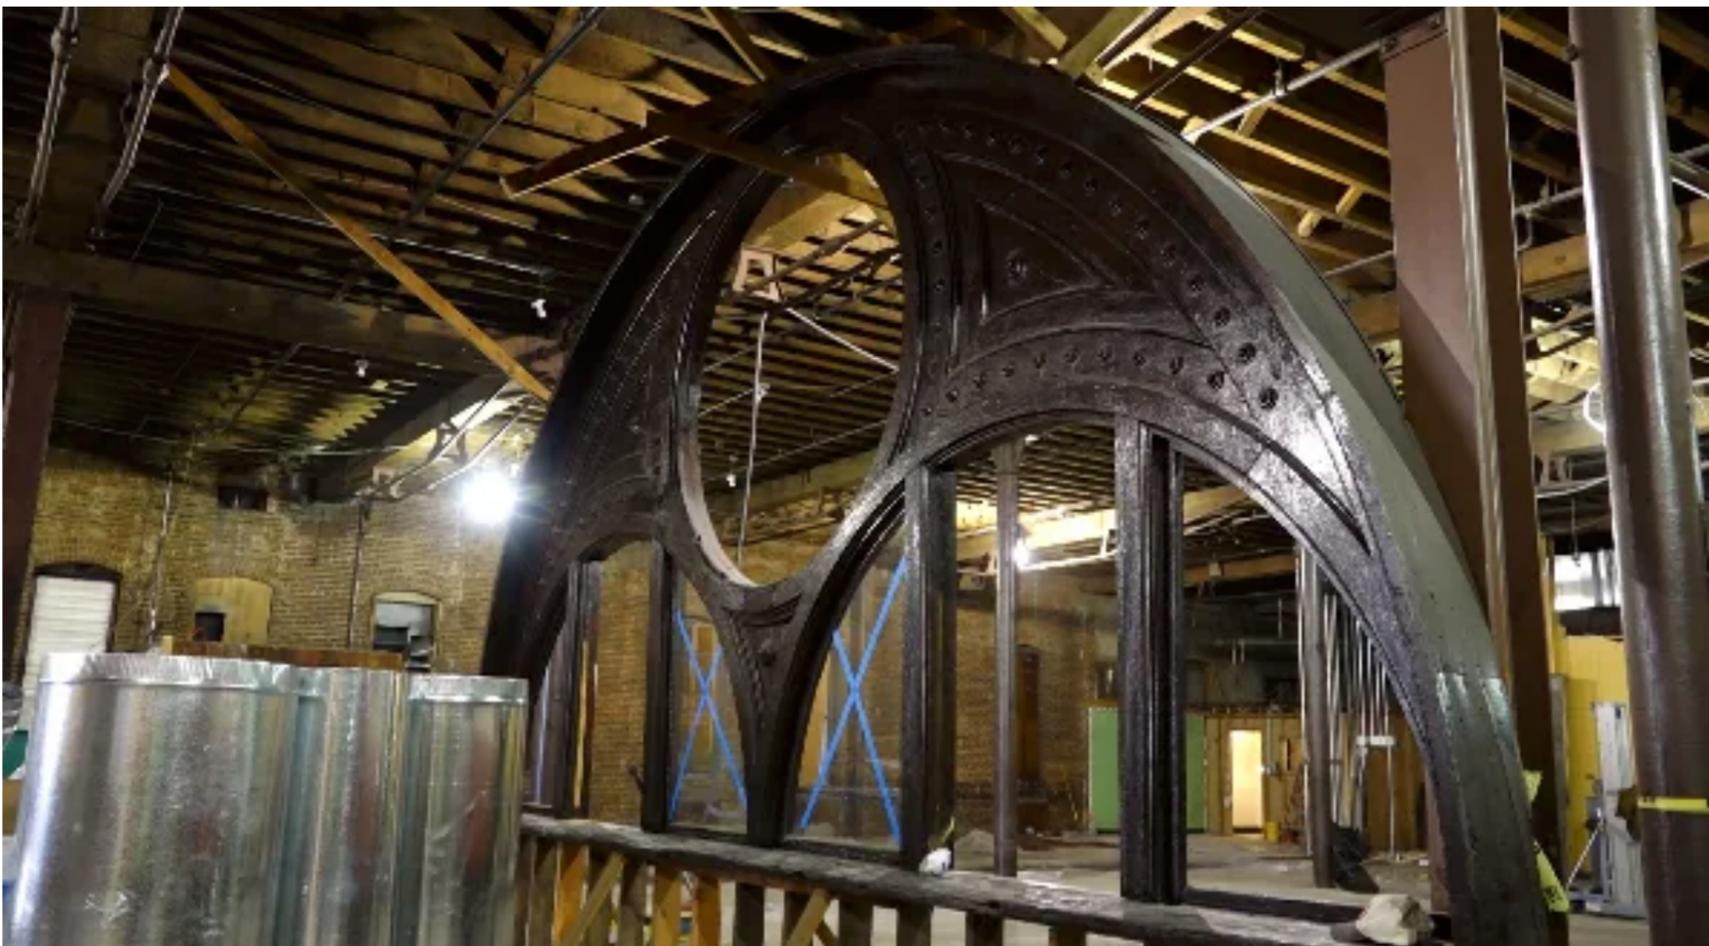

An original streetcar that serviced Denver's streets starting in the 1920s, car No. 54, will be available for private parties and diners in Urban Putt Denver's scratch kitchen restaurant.

A rendering from Roth Sheppard Architects shows what the streetcar will look like in its new location.

The original arch that graced the exterior of the building until the mid-70s is prominent in the newly updated space as the centerpiece of the meticulously restored bar.

The original metal arch that graced the exterior of the Denver City Cable Railway Building waits to be moved to its new location behind the bar.

Urban Putt Denver's bar menu will showcase local craft brews and an innovative cocktail menu.

A rendering from architect Roth Sheppard shows the metal arch incorporated behind the bar.

Urban Putt Denver mini-golfers will play six whimsical holes inspired by Colorado landmarks and locations: downtown Denver, Denver International Airport, an amusement park inspired by Elitch Gardens, the Denver City Cable Car Building, Red Rocks, and one based on the mountainscapes of the Rockies.

“The idea for Urban Putt came from crazy mini-golf parties my wife and I used to host in our cramped old San Francisco house,” said CEO and Chief Greenskeeper Steve Fox. “Our friends spent months creating themed golf holes, and we had such a great time playing with folks of all ages that we knew it was an idea we had to bring to life.”

A rendering from architect Roth Sheppard shows the entrance to Urban Putt's mini-golf course.

Urban Putt Denver is taking over the ground floor space of The Denver City Cable Railway Building, the former location of the downtown Old Spaghetti Factory. The building is undergoing extensive renovations and will open in mid-summer.

Crews prep the streetcar for a tricky, complicated move from one side of the space to the other.

You are welcome to download and use the following videos:

Urban Putt Denver Streetcar timelapse.mpeg

Shared with Dropbox

Urban Putt Denver Streetcar b-roll 2.mpeg

Shared with Dropbox

Urban Putt Denver Streetcar sound.mpeg

Shared with Dropbox

Sarah Beatty

PR Contact at M&C Communications

sarah@mandccommunications.com

303-949-2015

@HiJinxVideo

ABOUT URBAN PUTT DENVER

Founded in 2014 and located in the heart of the San Francisco Mission District, Urban Putt is the City's premier indoor miniature golf course. A vibrant and unique venue, Urban Putt is an equally perfect destination for a sporting round of mini-golf, family outing, sit-down dinner, company party, special event or drinks with friends. Denver will be Urban Putt's second location.

urbanputt.com

Newsroom published with Prezly: PR Software