MEET YOU IN PARIS

“I hope for the future that no mother will have to feel what I have felt, and love will win over hate.” Julie Wallace, Sara Zelenak’s mother

“We want to create something big that everyone remembers the name Sara Zelenak.” Mark Wallace, stepfather

In June last year, Mark and Julie Wallace were forced to face every parent’s worst fear when their 21-year-old daughter Sara Zelenak went missing after a terror attack in London.

For four days, their desperate calls and messages to the young nanny went unanswered as authorities tried to confirm her fate.

Just three months earlier, Sara had had the “biggest, cheesiest smile” on her face as she waved goodbye to her family at Brisbane International Airport.

Like so many other young Australians, she was flying the nest to live and work in London.

Mark and Julie Wallace were counting down the days until they met up with Sara again in Paris.

Instead, they became caught up in the world of international terrorism, dealing with Scotland Yard, hospitals and media from their Redland Bay home. As they landed in London, they received the news that Sara had died.

A year after their daughter's death, Sara's parents are making sense of the senseless act of terror by focusing on building a fitting legacy to Sara by helping other parents facing unimaginable grief and trauma.
